   H. Health Care Sub-Committee
      Dr. Kwong shared concerns over the long-term use of bone drugs and read report as follows…”the FDA published an analysis of popular bone-building drugs called biphosphonates. These drugs are used by millions of women. Although the FDA did not issue recommendations, it did suggest caution about long-term use of the drugs. The concern regarding these drugs is that after years of use, the drugs may actually weaken the bones in some women. Long-term use may lead to rare side effects such as unusual fractures of the thighbone, painful and disfiguring crumbling of the jaw and cancer of the food pipe. The analysis found that for the most women there is little benefit after three to five years of use. Women who have been on these drugs should discuss it with their doctors.”
